

Conditions are ripe for a Goldilocks economy, but dangers lurk

From the Field
February 2024

Key Insights

- Slowing inflation, combined with the current high level of interest rates, should give the U.S. Federal Reserve plenty of scope to cut rates this year.
- Growth should recover modestly, resulting in a “Goldilocks” global economy that is neither recessionary nor too expansionary.
- Risks to this benign outlook include the U.S. presidential election, the war in Ukraine, and continuing tensions in the Middle East and South China Sea.

What a difference a quarter makes! At the end of October, the yield on the 10-year U.S. Treasury bond touched 5%. By late January, it had plunged to 4.1%. Over the same period, the yield on the German counterpart fell from almost 3% to 2.3%. Risk assets, which were under pressure when yields were rising, surged in response to the rally in government bonds (Fig. 1).

Digging deeper into the causes of the bond market rally should help us to understand the implications for the global economy and the world’s central banks and, by extension, the likely path for risk assets in the period ahead. The third-quarter sell-off in bonds was largely driven by anxiety that the combination of high government financing needs and the reduction in central banks’ sovereign bond portfolios

(quantitative tightening) would trigger a buyers’ strike. There was also concern that stubborn service sector inflation would prevent central banks from cutting rates.

Two major developments changed the narrative: First, in response to the pressures in the bond market, the U.S. Treasury slowed the pace of increase in quarterly long-term debt issuance and the Federal Reserve indicated it may have to adjust its policy stance in a more market-friendly direction; second, and equally important, softer-than-expected inflation data reinforced the perception that the Fed had the required policy space to accommodate the bond market sell-off.

Prior to these developments, the belief among many that the U.S. was heading for recession seemed to rest on the notion that the Fed had overtightened monetary policy and would be slow to respond to mounting growth risks. The pivot in the Fed’s communication, therefore, significantly cut the tail risk that the U.S. economy would fall into a recession. As is often the case, the reduction of tail risk ended up having an outsized impact on the price of growth and risk-friendly assets such as equities.

Why I expect a downsize inflation surprise

So where do we go from here? Will central banks be able to deliver on the lofty expectations for interest rate cuts that the market has priced in? Broadly speaking, I believe they will.

In my view, inflation is likely to surprise on the downside. Growth in China—the preeminent source of demand for commodities—remains muted as the economy goes through a protracted deleveraging cycle and the authorities aim to reorient the economy toward new drivers of structural growth. Europe is already in a recession, and, given the European Central Bank’s resistance to rate cuts, it is only a matter of time before the recessionary dynamics spill out through the labor markets. The U.S. economy is resilient, but it is likely to slow throughout 2024.

These moderating growth dynamics, combined with the current high level of interest rates, suggest to me that the Fed can cut interest rates substantially without its policy stance becoming overly accommodative. As such, I don’t regard the interest rate market as grossly mispriced.

Regarding growth, I am looking for signs of improvement. Global growth remains subdued and a strong rebound is unlikely, but I am looking for the data flow to shift from bad to just weak (in financial markets, a reduction of a negative is often more powerful than the emergence of a positive). I also think we will see a risk-friendly rotation in growth from the U.S. to Europe. Overall growth will continue to look soft and monetary policy will remain a headwind—but marginally less so.

Geopolitical risks cannot be ignored

Yet amid this Goldilocks view of the world, risks lie in the shadows. Despite the Fed’s pivot, the markets could return to the October worries about bond supply fears. The outcome of the U.S. presidential election could further elevate this fear if the market expects the next U.S. administration to return to an expansionary fiscal stance (although this risk will likely be somewhat offset by the slowing of the Fed’s balance sheet tapering).

The risk posed by the U.S. presidential election is not limited to concerns over fiscal policy. The U.S. remains as polarized as ever, and the election will bring elevated uncertainty about the future of both U.S. domestic and foreign policy. Geopolitical risk is also rising elsewhere, from the war in Ukraine to the conflict in Israel and tensions in the South China Sea.

As has been the case for the past two years, financial markets remain volatile and difficult to navigate. It is important not to lose sight of the dangers, but in the near term, I believe the likely combination of softer central bank policy, moderating inflation, and a marginal improvement in growth will keep us on a positive course.

“ The risk posed by the U.S. presidential election is not limited to concerns over fiscal policy.”
