MARKET COMMENTARY

U.S. stocks fell in February as signs of reaccelerating inflation weighed on investor sentiment. As measured by various Russell indexes, small-cap equities performed best, followed by large-cap and mid-cap. Growth outperformed value across all market capitalizations. Within the S&P 500, the energy sector fared worst, with the real estate and utilities sectors also performing poorly. Only information technology stocks advanced, albeit modestly.

Early in the month, stocks were buoyed by strong jobs and unemployment numbers. Stocks began a persistent downward slide at mid-month, however, as further data suggested that inflationary pressures were still intact, if not rising. Investors were concerned that persistent price pressures could force the Federal Reserve to continue raising interest rates and keep borrowing costs elevated for some time, thus increasing the potential for slower economic and corporate earnings growth, and possibly a recession.

Federal Reserve policy, and the market's reaction to their signals, will likely continue to influence U.S. equity markets going forward as the market seeks clarity on whether it can execute a "soft landing"-with slower but still positive growth-or its efforts result in a full-fledged recession that drags down earnings. While there are good reasons for caution in 2023, excessive pessimism and volatility can create value for agile investors. In difficult markets, security selection will be critical.

Definitions

Active Share is a holdings based measure of active management representing the percentage of a portfolio's holdings that differ from those in its benchmark. Compared to tracking error, which measures the standard deviation of the difference in a manager's returns versus the Benchmark returns, Active Share allows investors to get a clearer understanding of what a manager is doing to drive performance, rather than drawing conclusions from observed returns. The greater the difference between the asset composition of a product and its benchmark, the greater the active share is.
