MARKET COMMENTARY

The U.S. investment-grade (IG) fixed income market, as measured by the Bloomberg U.S. Aggregate Bond Index, recorded positive returns in March, although first-quarter results were negative as a result of a two-month losing streak at the start of the year. A slight drop in longer-term Treasury yields along with generally tighter credit spreads supported the March rebound.

Treasury yields fluctuated during the month but finished slightly lower across much of the curve. Higher-than-expected inflation data helped drive up Treasury yields through the first half of the month, while a Federal Reserve meeting that was generally perceived as dovish sent rates lower toward the end of March. After starting the month at 4.25%, the benchmark 10-year Treasury yield rose as high as 4.34%, the highest closing level since the end of November, according to Treasury Department data, before dropping back to 4.20% at month-end.

At the Fed meeting, policymakers, as expected, left the federal funds rate unchanged, but investors were more focused on the Summary of Economic Projections, which continued to show that the median Fed forecaster expects three interest rate cuts this year. The projections did point to stronger growth and inflation this year than previously indicated, while also removing one rate cut from the forecast for 2025.

Absolute results were positive in all the major benchmark sectors due to falling Treasury yields, while excess returns were also generally positive. IG corporates benefited from solid technicals, resilient economic data, and a risk-on environment and produced the strongest absolute and excess returns. Commercial mortgage-backed securities (CMBS) performed well-particularly beaten-down, lower-rated issues-amid solid demand, while the agency mortgage-backed securities sector received a boost from expectations for lower rate volatility and manageable supply. Asset-backed securities delivered modest excess returns but trailed other sectors amid elevated new issuance.
